1. Theme of the Issue

A note this month on the remarkable work of the Open Society Justice Initiative which, though privately resourced, is rivalling major government funders in the field of access to justice around the world. On the news front, the usual mix of protests and cuts in common law countries facing the squeeze as well as more positive news from countries establishing legal aid schemes. Positive prize of the month goes to Bulgaria which has just increased its legal aid budget by a third – albeit from a low start: it is a country in which the Open Society Justice Initiative has been active.

Mixed reports from China where, on the one hand, there has been a crackdown on the legal aid organisation that assisted in such cases as those relating to the tainted milk litigation and, on the other hand, an initiative to send lawyers out into poor areas of the country.

Quote of the month goes to the Chinese official who said: 'Lawyers are a group with a strong sense of social responsibility ... Besides, they have earned enough money, and don't have to worry about giving up one or two years' income.'

2. Contributions

Exploring the limits of international philanthropy: the role of the Open Society Justice Initiative

The Open Society Justice Initiative (Justice Initiative) is an impressive trans-national funder and encourager of developments in legal aid. Its role can be favourably comparable to that of international bodies such as the European Union or even the World Bank. The Justice Initiative is part of a network of foundations – some thematic and some national - funded by the philanthropist, George Soros, since 1993. Like much of the network, the Justice Initiative began with a focus in Eastern Europe after the collapse of the Soviet Union. In this short note, Anna Ogorodova, a Justice Initiative legal officer, summarises its work in supporting criminal justice reform around the world—especially, now, in sub-Saharan Africa, Latin America and, historically, in Central and Eastern Europe.

In most countries, wealthy and poor alike, legal aid systems are typically under resourced and in a dire need for reform. But the problem and its consequences are much greater in the developing countries. Many developing countries have a dearth of trained lawyers. In Sierra Leone, for example, just seven lawyers work in the rural areas, where 80 percent of the country's six-million population lives. In other countries, for example in Central and Eastern Europe, there exist a sufficient number of legal professionals, but very few are genuinely motivated to provide legal aid services. State funding of legal aid for the poor is nominal. Little attention is paid to building institutions to support legal professionals working for the poor. Even less is being done to promote the pro bono culture of legal assistance.

For these reasons, the Justice Initiative chose promoting access to free and effective legal assistance for indigent criminal defendants as one of the priority areas of its criminal justice reform program. We started with an initiative aiming to effectuate a comprehensive reform of publicly funded legal services in Lithuania. Since then, governments in a number of countries of Central and Eastern Europe and former Soviet Union - Lithuania, Georgia, Bulgaria and Moldova – have entirely revamped their ineffective and erratic legal aid systems thanks to our advocacy and technical assistance work. New legal aid laws were adopted. New management institutions responsible for legal aid organization, management and delivery were created. Innovative and cost-effective models for the provision of legal aid – such as the public defender offices and legal clinics - were developed.

Since the program's inception we have been expanding our geographic and thematic reach. A bulk of our current activities, for example, is carried out in Africa. In the African region, we focus on enhancing access to paralegal services for poor detainees from the earliest moments of detention. For example, in Sierra Leone we work with a local NGO Timap for Justice to deploy paralegals to provide legal assistance to pre-trial detainees. The project was designed to respond to the most pressing problems of the Sierra Leonean criminal justice system: severe lack of legal assistance, excessively long pre-trial detention, and massive delays in case processing. Detainees accused of minor crimes, such as stealing a chicken or a cup of rice, may remain in jail for three or four years awaiting trial. Most delays occur because pre-trial detention hearings in courts are routinely postponed. There may be up to 70 adjournments in one case. Paralegals are helping to shorten detention periods and prevent delays in pre-trial proceedings. They attend police stations, assist remand prisoners at magistrates' courts, advise pre-trial detainees on their legal rights, help defendants communicate with their families, and facilitate defendants' release on bail. They also liaise with police, prisons and courts to help accelerate the pre-trial justice processes. Similar projects are now being developed in Malawi and Kenya.
